Background

- Indigenous women are overrepresented as victims of human trafficking. They make up four per cent of the Canadian female population but roughly 50% of trafficking victims.¹
- This over-representation can be attributed to past and ongoing colonization, which has forced Indigenous women into precarious social and economic positions.
- Twenty-five per cent of all trafficked women are under 18.² In addition to being below the age of consent, youth experience increased rates of precarious housing and employment situations, especially when they are in or transitioning out of the child welfare system.
- 2SLGBTQ+: these communities deal with higher rates of trafficking and exploitation as they face a lack of support and multiple forms of marginalization, sometimes from within their own communities.³

Defining Human Trafficking

- Public Safety Canada defines human trafficking as the "recruitment, transportation, harbouring and/or exercising control, direction or influence over the movements of a person in order to exploit that person, typically through sexual exploitation or forced labour."⁴
- Human trafficking, sexual exploitation, survival sex and sex work are distinct experiences with a range of impacts that require targeted supports and policy responses.

Supporting Survivors

- NWAC believes that all Indigenous women, girls and gender diverse people are valuable, mournable and entitled to autonomy and support.
- Women impacted by the distinct experiences of human trafficking, survival sex, sexual exploitation and sex work need to have stigma-free and equal access to appropriate programs and services.
- This includes justice services, economic security, housing and health services including reproductive justice, trans care, mental health care, STBBI/HIV testing and treatment, drug treatment and basic preventative medicine.
