Incarceration and Indigenous Women

- Despite accounting for less than four per cent of the female population, Indigenous women make up 39% of the female prison population.
- In Manitoba and Saskatchewan, Indigenous women represent approximately 85% of female admissions to federal custody, a number that increases in territorial jurisdictions.¹
- Indigenous women are more likely to be involuntarily segregated and face longer segregation placements than non-Indigenous women.
- Presently, Indigenous women make up 50% of federal segregation placements, in which prisoners may be, “isolated from others for months and even years on administrative grounds.”¹
- Indigenous women account for 50% of maximum security placements.
- Upwards of 50% of federally sentenced women have identified mental health needs and many others have significant histories of trauma and abuse. The comparable figure for men is 26%.
- Indigenous women, with their lived experience of colonial patriarchy, intergenerational trauma and state violence, are uniquely vulnerable to the harmful effects of isolation.²

“The over-incarceration of First Nations, Métis and Inuit people in corrections is among the most pressing social justice and human rights issue in Canada today.” ⁴

30. We call upon federal, provincial, and territorial governments to commit to eliminating the overrepresentation of Aboriginal people in custody over the next decade, and to issue detailed annual reports that monitor and evaluate progress in doing so.

31. We call upon the federal, provincial, and territorial governments to provide sufficient and stable funding to implement and evaluate community sanctions that will provide realistic alternatives to imprisonment for Aboriginal offenders and respond to the underlying causes of offending.

35. We call upon the federal government to eliminate barriers to the creation of additional Aboriginal healing lodges within the federal correctional system (S. 81 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act).

36. We call upon the federal, provincial, and territorial governments to work with Aboriginal communities to provide culturally relevant services to inmates on issues such as substance abuse, family and domestic violence, and overcoming the experience of having been sexually abused (S. 84 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act).

37. We call upon the federal government to provide more supports for Aboriginal programming in halfway houses and parole services.
